

MALE students

Did you know your student services fees are being used to promote lies about a rape crisis on campus?
Lies which risk you being thrown out of university?

It's all about establishing a campus "believe-the-victim" justice system where women's word is gospel and men are rarely believed.

The system is being stacked against you!

The National Union of Students, using Sydney University SRC funding, is paying activists to try to shut down discussion about what's going on here. The National Union of Students conference last year passed a motion agreeing to fund protesters taking on Bettina Arndt, who has been conducting a campus tour exposing the truth about the so-called 'rape crisis.'

Bettina, a former clinical psychology and sex therapist, is now a well-known social commentator speaking out about men's issues, including feminist misinformation about the safety of our campuses.

She warns our universities are getting involved in the criminal justice business, setting up kangaroo courts which fail to offer accused young men normal legal protections. This happened over a decade ago in America and thousands of young men had their lives derailed. Bettina is helping male students across Australia battle for fair treatment from their universities.

The truth about the “rape crisis”

For years activists have promoted statistics suggesting most female students are at risk of sexual assault. In 2017 The Australian Human Rights Commission conducted a million-dollar survey aimed at revealing the truth about this important issue.

The survey of 30,000 students found each year only 0.8 per cent of students experienced sexual assault, using a very broad definition including ‘being tricked into sex against your will,’ or being touched by a stranger on public transport to and from uni.

Most of these experiences weren’t what most of us consider “rape” – 40 % said they weren’t serious enough to report and 40 % said they didn’t need help.

This means over 99 per cent of students had no such experience – so most students are perfectly safe at our universities.

The AHRC and our universities ignored these positive results but rather claimed there were high levels of “sexual violence” by using data which actually showed most students experience low-grade sexual harassment – mainly unwanted staring, jokes or comments.

Activists bullying universities into pretending there is still a rape crisis

When the AHRC proved such a fizzer, the activists stopped talking about the “rape crisis” but rather doubled down on the universities to do more about “sexual violence.” Tanya Plibersek has promised to withhold funding from universities which don’t fall into line. Most Australian universities now have sexual violence help lines and counselling services, compulsory courses on sexual consent – which teach students that only males are responsible for decisions around sexual activity.

The huge number of bureaucrats now employed by universities to manage this system are more interested in protecting their jobs by promoting the rape crisis than ensuring fair treatment for male students.

This is creating an increasingly anti-male culture on our universities where male sexuality is demonised and male students at risk of false accusation.

Anyone who speaks out about what’s happening here is shut down. Last year Sydney University security called in the riot squad to remove violent protesters blocking students from attending Bettina’s campus talk. This led to the Federal government establishing an inquiry into free speech on campuses.

What do they want with you?

The end goal is to force universities to get involved in investigating and adjudicating rape cases, using a lower standard of proof than normal criminal law to ensure more convictions. That’s what happened in America where all publicly-funded universities were required to set up tribunals to investigate and decide such cases. Thousands of students were thrown out of colleges and are now winning legal cases against those universities for failing to protect their legal rights, particularly in cases involving false accusations.

The same is happening here. Last year Sydney University introduced new regulations for investigating and adjudicating rape cases using the “balance of probabilities”. A sexual assault rape accusation can lead to student being suspended from university, lives and careers ruined by a system which offers none of the usual legal protections. Our criminal law system is being highjacked by this new “believe-the-victim” form of justice – which means the woman’s version of events carries more weight than the man’s.

Male students – take action to protect yourselves

Go to Bettina Arndt’s website and YouTube channel for more information about what’s happening.

Watch her YouTube video with the Adelaide student about the ordeal which followed a false rape accusation by a female student:

“It was really frightening being investigated for rape by the Adelaide University committee, knowing they could withhold my PhD and derail my career if they refused to believe what actually happened. It was seven months of hell and endless sleepless nights knowing the system was set up to believe the ‘victim’ which meant her lies could end up ruining my life.”
